Treasures, Rich and Rare.

A correspondent of the Boston Atlas, in his recollections of an interview with Samuel Rogers, the some verses which were written in 1833, entitled. author of the Pleasures of Memory, thus describes the library of the millionaire poet :

What a magnificent room was that library of Rogers's! There were paintings from the hands of the best ancient and modern masters, in gorgeous frames. Portiolios of the choicest and rarest prints-water color drawings, by every artist of celebrity, of past and present times-rare specimens of vertu, which would have thrown the proprietor of Strawberry Hill into a very flutter of excitement. Busts, some brown with age, and others in all the brilliant modern whiteness of Carrara marble-costly gems and priceless intaglios. Books, curious in their old literal board covers, with ancient silver clasps and venerable letters. Manuscripts, so precious from time, and in consequence of the labor which had been bestowed on them by gray monks, in solemn old cells, ages since, that they were shrined in crystal cases. There was a large piece of Amber, in which was a fly enclosed, perfect and unmutilated, leaving us to wonder how it got there, and achieved its transparent immortality. Sidney Smith once taking it up said, "perhaps it buzzed in Adam's ear." And there were vases of exquisite form and workmanship-relics from Pompeii and from far away India; and all so tastefully disposed that no museum effect was produced, nor did any one object so obtrude itself as to detract from the apparent value of the impression produced by another.

On a pedestal was a bust of Pope, modelled, at least so far as a part of the drapery was concerned. by the artist (Roubillac, I believe,) in the presence of Mr. Rogers. But there were two objects in the room, which, more than any others, engrossed my attention: the one represented the enormous wealth of its possessor, and the other indicated his keen appreciation of the value of mind. These arricles were simply two small pieces of paper, in gold frames. One of them was a Bank of England note for one million pounds sterling, and the other the original receipt of John Milton for five pounds (the sum he received for the copyright of Paradise Lost, from Simmonds the bookseller.) The bank note was one of the only four which were ever struck from a plate, which was afterwards destroyed. The Rothschilds have one in possession; the late Mr. Coutts had another; the Bank of England the third, and, as I have said, Mr. Rogers decorates his parlor with the remaining one. There it hangs, within one's reach-a fortune for many, but valueless to all excepting its owner. No one would think of stealing it, for it would be only as so much waste paper. It never could be negotiated without detection, and, were it destroyed by fire, from its peculiar character no loss would ensue to Mr. Rogers. At his word, however, it might be transformed into a golden shower. He. alone, is the magician who can render it all powerful for good or evil.

Most Capital Joke.

The editor of the Advertiser, published at Lowell, Mass., tells the following excellent story, every word of it he puts down as being as true as gospel :

It is well known that in our vicinity, there will probably be built at some not very distant day a new manufacturing town, which, it is predicted, will rival Lowell. At all events, a very wealthy corporation have purchased water power and land at a heavy outlay. A short time since, a distinguished and rich member of the company called upon a landholder down the river for the purpose of negotiating for a parcel of land, supposed to be necessary, to the success of the new enterprise. Liberal offers were made, but the holder was not ready to part with his landhe wanted time to reflect. 'Yes, $50,000. sir, I do say it-and what do you say to that, sir !" replied the millionaire, with the air of a man who feels he is fairly "out of the woods." "Oh, nothing at all," quoth the farmer; "only, I own about ten times as much land on tother side, and would be willing to do something handsome, if you will agree to go over the river !"
